Government Accountability Office, 2005 OCLC Number: (OCoLC)62365532 Subject: United States -- Armed Forces -- Recruiting, enlistment, etc. -- Evaluation. Excerpt: . . . Background In 1970, President Nixon directed the Commission on an All Volunteer The Charge and the Armed Force - the Gates Commission--to develop a plan to eliminate Debate of the All conscription and institute an All Volunteer Force (AVF). The commission unanimously recommended the elimination of conscription, while noting Volunteer Force th that, except during major wars and the latter half of the 20 century, the United States has historically relied on volunteers for its military forces. Prior to the adoption of the AVF, there were a number of arguments made for and against an AVF. Some of these arguments, offered by members of the commission, Congress, military leaders, and the public, follow: Arguments against an AVF Opinion that military service is an obligation of citizenship. Concern that the military would attract an insufficient number of recruits, especially during times of war. Concern that because of relatively poorer civilian opportunities, African Americans would be attracted to the higher pay of a voluntary force and therefore would be overrepresented in the force. Fear that a volunteer military would not attract a cross section of high-quality American youth, causing a decline in military effectiveness. The AVF is costly because of higher costs for benefits and increased pay. Arguments for an AVF Concern that conscription is inequitable, divisive, and inefficient. Availability of more potential recruits in the late 1960s because the baby boom generation provided more young men eligible for military service. Concern that minorities, especially African Americans, represented a disproportionate share of Vietnam War fatalities....
