Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from For the Good of the Game: Handling and Candling Eggs, With Side Lights on Live Poultry The United States Department of Agriculture gives notice that: Shipments containing more than five percent of bad eggs will be regarded as violating the Food and Drugs Act. In the opinion of that Department, eggs which contain yolks stuck to the shell (Spots), Blood Rings, Red or White Rots, Green Whites, Sour Rots, Moldy Eggs, and any other eggs which consist wholly or in part of a filthy, decomposed, or putrid substance, are adulterated. Eggs which are adulterated may be shipped in interstate or foreign commerce for use in tanning or other technical ways, without violating the provisions of the Food and Drugs Act only, if they are first denatured so as to render them incapable of being used for food. Since it is impracticable to denature eggs in the shell, adulterated eggs must be broken out and denatured prior to shipment. Both the Federal and State authorities are determined to enforce the laws governing the sale of bad eggs. It follows that dealers in eggs should be extremely careful in the matter of making sure that the stock they offer for sale meets the law s requirements. While the officials will consider that any lots of eggs destined for food purposes and containing a maximum of 5 percent bad ones as being barely passable, still they will be liable to view with suspicion any lots containing that number of bad ones, or perhaps less, as being stock that was not candled with the view to eliminate all bad ones, but candled to leave in as many bad eggs...
