Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Dove Marine Laboratory, Cullercoats, Northumberland: Report for the Year Ending June 30th, 1912 The papers in this Report deal with Fishery questions and with the more purely scientific work of the Laboratory. Samples of trawled and drift net herring were examined in the past year, but the report with regard to them is withheld until we get an opportunity of examining more material this season. Mr. Storrow has added to the account he gave of the Prawn (Norway Lobster) Fishery of North Shields, tables dealing with the months which, owing to the coal strike, were not included in the report of last year. These will be found to satisfactorily complete the description of this form in so far as it is possible to do so from an examination of market material. Further experiments have been made on the migrations of the crab. As in previous years it was found that a proportion of the females - those which are to spawn in the next season - migrate northwards. The females which remain in the district of liberation are evidently females which will spawn in the following year, the migration being similarly postponed for a year. It is probable that both the ripening of the gonads and the migration are in the case of the older females postponed for even two years. The experiments in lobster culture were mainly directed to finding out the best means of obtaining a large quantity of healthy larva 3, and the results pointed plainly to the value of large tanks or ponds. The mussel culture experiments at Holy Island have also been continued. About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds...
