Hamer, Pronounced Before the General Assembly of Ohio, at Columbus, January 18, 1847 Fellow Citizens: - There has been a wonderful change in the condition of civilized man since the memorable document, just now read in your hearing, was promulgated to the world. His conceptions of the object and end of human government, are now widely different from the crude notions which were then entertained by the greatest portion of the people on the habitable globe. The monstrous absurdity that kings ruled by divine right had prevailed for centuries; and even in England, under their boasted Magna Charta, the history of the reign of the Tudors and of the Stuarts is little else than a gloomy picture of the licentiousness of power, when exerted by tyrannical rulers over the heads of an ignorant and servile people. It seems to have been claimed by the crowned heads of the old world, (and the deep debasement of their...
