RareBooksClub. Paperback. Book Condition: New. This item is printed on demand. Paperback. 18 pages. OCLC Number: 227172348 Excerpt: . . . advanced emissions control technologies (such as particulate matter traps or oxidation catalysts) or the use of a cleaner fuel. For example, diesel oxidation catalysts can result in a per vehicle particulate matter reductions of 20-40 . Diesel particulate filters reduce particulate matter up to 90 per vehicle. To help stakeholders identify cost-effective technologies, EPA has developed a list of verified retrofit technologies that contains information on expected emission reduction benefits. This list provides information on numerous innovative emission control technologies that EPA has approved for receiving emission reduction credit. Each EPA verified technology has undergone extensive testing and analysis. The verification process includes evaluations of the emissions reduction performance of retrofit technologies-including the durability of the technologies-and identification of engine operating criteria and other conditions that must exist for these approved technologies to achieve the verified level of reductions. EPA evaluates each technology using a specific fuel, on a specific engine, and under specific loading cycles. The California Air Resources Board (CARB) has a verification process similar to EPAs verification process. EPA has signed a Memorandum of Agreement with CARB to recognize CARBs list of verified 10 emission control options. In addition, EPA has established a comprehensive list of idle-control 11 technologies, which is available on the EPA website. To help stakeholders compare cost-effective strategies, EPA has included an appendix with 4 tables containing estimates of the cost per ton of pollutant reduced, for projects and programs that are potentially eligible for CMAQ funding. The estimates are derived from the best data available to EPA at the time this document was issued. The source of the information is identified for each project category. The tables...
