These are indeed pro tanto national impoverishments: but not so changes of individual wealth, produced by new financial or monetary systems; and for such Mr. Peel has been most unduly blamed. Mr. Doubleday quotes a pamphlet by Wm. Ward, Esq., who affirms that Mr. Ricardo retracted this statement on his death bed to Alderman Heygate, and admitted its extent to have been twenty-five per cent. A most costly and pernicious practice is growing up among us of making every occasion of rejoicing or mourning alike a day of national idleness. Each boly-day costs at least half-a-million. Mr. Peel should scarcely have opposed the Act of Earl Grey s Government for making Bank of England Notes a legal tender. It was obviously needed as a preservation against panics, and runs on country banks for gold. But he did rightly in opposing the...
