Not illustrated. 1904 Excerpt: .two months later when it may cradle a nest of Maryland yellowthroats. In a meadow bordering the swamp I heard the whistle of the meadowlark and soon discovered first here, then there, one of the birds stalking along, his gray and brown stripped head projecting above the brown grass and stubble with which the color of his back blended perfectly. When the clear, confident, persuasive whistle of the meadow-lark comes up from the meadow, then wefeel sure that winter has lost itsgrip--it is indeed, Spring o the year, even though it be the twenty-fifth of March. I saw nothing of the red winged blackbirds, but on Tuesday along a little stream bordered with a grove of elms, maples and evergreens we found them and heard their liquid call coop-er-dee. Here the grackles were so numerous that their squeaky shrill call nearly drowned the fainter bird notes. Their vocal organs seem to be in a chronic change of voice period. Up from the stream in a sunny spot a flock of goldfinches were twittering and warbling their song which seems to have no set beginning or end. But they seemed very shy and not until another day was I able to get near enough to them to find out whether they had donned their spring suit of black and yellow. Close view revealed them clad in brown. Hidden among the foliage of an evergreen I came upon another flock of birds. Out from the mysteries depths of...
